Although he may have first heard the story from the lips of Petrarch, it is certain that he had the Latin version of the latter before him when he wrote. This is shown as well by the closeness of Chaucers version as by the fact that, in the margins of the Ellesmere and Hengwrt MSS. , numerous quotations from that version are actually written on the margins, each in its proper place. The test of metre, as Mr Skeat points out, gives the same result, as it shows that it was one of his early works. It is most probable that the main part of the poem was written soon after 1373, and that it was afterwards fitted, with some changes and additions, into the series of the Canterbury Tales. The Prologue must, of course, have been written subsequently to Petrarchs...
