Not illustrated. 1916 Excerpt: begin at March 20, which is the first day of our spring. Notice that on this date the sunlight reaches exactly as far as the North Pole. The South Pole is not shown in the figure, but the light reaches also to that point. As the earth passes on into April, May, and June, you will notice that the North Pole passes farther and farther into the light, while the South Pole, of course, must be equally far in the shadow. June 21 is the summer solstice, the beginning of our summer. Solstice (sun stop) is so called because the sun appears to stop and move back toward the south. From the beginning of summer until September 22, the North Pole begins to pass out of the light, and finally comes into the same position that it had at the beginning of spring. These two dates--March 20 and September 22--are called the equinoxes, because at these times the days and nights are equal in every part of the earth. From the beginning of autumn until the beginning of winter, on December 21, the North Pole passes farther into the shadow and the South Pole just as far into the light. The North Pole is now turned away from the sun, while on June 21 it was turned toward the sun. From December 21, the winter solstice, until March 20, the North Pole begins to turn again toward the sun, and comes back into the light again...
